Among the odd sights that attract the attention of a visitor in Honoldu, Sandwich Islands, is that of the netives carrying hay or grass for sale about the streets. At each end of the carrying stick, or mamaka, as it is called—commonly used by them to carry their burdens—is a cylinder of hay about five feet long, artistically tled around with rush strings. These bundles will weigh anywhere from six or eight to twenty-five pounds, varying as the weight of the fixed price of twenty-five cents a bundle, more or less, good or bad. The custom of the place is to buy from day to day the supply for a horse, as the day's milk is bought.
